PERSONAL AND SOCIETY.

[All society and personal notes for the Sunday issue of the Journal, to secure publication, must be in the hands of the city editor by Saturday

There are literary, musical and social clubs by the score in Indianapolis, but so far as reported there are as yet no book clubs. Book clubs are not unknown in New England and in some of the Southern States, and that they have not become more general is a surprise. To many persons the idea of a literary club has its drawbacks on account of the extensive reading and preparation, to say nothing of the time required for the fulfillment of the duties imposed by membership. For these reasons many hesitate to belong, much as they would like to. One book club, which seems to be conducted in the mor; approved manner, is thus governed: The membership is limited to twenty; each one pays $3 a year. The only officers or directors is a committee of three members, who spend the money for books. Every one knows that the latest works in the Public Library are difficult to procure when they are first out. The committee buys these books, or books on any special subjects the members may prefer. By purchasing in such quantity, a liberal discount is given by the book-seller, so that more can be had for the money than any private individual could possibly procure. A list of the members is pasted in the front of the book. This list is arranged so that the succession of names is not alphabetical, but by nearness of residence. A book is given to member, and each Saturday the book is sent by the member to the one whose name appears next on the list. This is the only duty of membership. The club is in active service the entire year. Once a year three members gather all the books, which are well bound, and make them in twenty packages and number each package. The members meet and draw a number from a basket, and the number drawn secures the package of books with the corresponding number. Then the package of books are added to the member's home library. In this way all the best publications are secured, and the member has for her own library more books than she could possibly buy for $3, and has the reading of the entire library for a year. There is only one meeting, one committee and one fee. Another club similar to this simplest one has a meeting once very three months, when the members discuss the books read. Another club entertains with handsome luncheons every six or eight weeks. That is, one member entertains the others, so that with a club membership of twenty the duty of entertaining would be something like one luncheon every eighteen months or two years, not an ing would be something like one luncheon every eighteen months or two years, not an operous duty. There are variations which any book club could adopt. There are magazine clubs, which may be organized with a membership of ten or twelve, or even less, and all the leading magazines subscribed for. In a city not far distant, the ladies have started a book club which has assumed such proportions that there is a membership of 130. The fee is $10, and they have two handsomely-furnished reading-rooms down town, where any periodical may be found, as well as a well-selected library of the best publications. In whatever form of book club selected the idea is a good one, and will doubtless spread like wildfire.
